

NEW TOWN

Founded by a New Coal Company is Attracting Wide Attention.

Not the least in importance among the industries of West Virginia is the plant of the Four State Coal & Coke Company, of Pittsburgh, situated about two miles from Worthington, W. Va. The plant is at a new town known as Anna Belle. The new town, built entirely of steel, when completed will be, it is said, the second largest in the world and the most modern in all its appointments.

The shaft is 210 feet deep, and it will be equipped with the finest machinery invented for the purpose.

One of the most important features of this plant is the "Lenny Fan," erected by the Lenny Manufacturing Company, of Connellsville, Pa., the dimensions of which are as follows: Thirty-five feet in diameter, 105 feet in circumference and 8 feet wide. There is only one larger fan in existence; built by the same company, in a Pennsylvania town. The iron work of the tipple is constructed by the Jeffrey's Construction Company, of Columbus, O.

The Four State Company owns 8,000 acres of coal lands and also the town of Anna Belle. Thirty new brick houses are under construction and when completed together with the houses already built, will make a very pretty town.

The company manufactures its own brick, and everybody works and hustles from the manager down. A rough estimate places the cost of the plant between two and three million dollars. The chief manager is Mr. Frank Miller.

The company built the railroad at its own expense, bridging the West Fork river at Worthington at an enormous cost. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad, however, makes an allowance of $2.00 per car until the cost is paid back.
